The 10-step nurture sequence

Read it once cover to cover. Then come back every time a campaign underperforms. The diagnosis is almost always in here.

SECTION ONE

Why Standard Cold Email Is Broken in 2026

Before you fix your cold email, you have to understand what is actually happening inside your prospect's head when they see your name in the inbox. This is not about tactics. It is about psychology.

LAW 01

Be a pattern disrupt, not a pattern match

Your prospect's brain has been trained by years of "Hey {Name}, quick question?" to classify anything similar as spam in under two seconds. The moment your email looks, sounds, or feels like the other 99 in their inbox, you are dead before they finish your subject line. Your job is not to write a good cold email. Your job is to write one that does not look like a cold email at all.

LAW 02

You have 5 seconds. Act like it.

Sender name, subject line, preview text, first sentence. Those four things determine everything. If they do not earn you a sixth second, nothing else in your email matters.

LAW 03

Write about them, never about you

"We are a results-driven agency that..." Nobody cares. Strip every "we," "our team," and "I founded" from your draft. If a sentence is not about their world, their problem, or their result, delete it.

LAW 04

Lead with value, not a calendar link

Asking for 30 minutes from a stranger is a transaction with a terrible exchange rate. Lead with something they actually want. Reciprocity does the rest.

LAW 05

Specificity is the antidote to skepticism

"We help companies grow" is ignored. "We helped a hybrid events company hit 420 warm leads from 7,400 emails" gets read. The more specific the claim, the more the brain marks it as true.

LAW 06

Treat every reply like free market research

Track every objection, every wrong-person reply, every not now. They tell you exactly what to fix in your targeting, your offer, and your script.

THE HARD TRUTH

Most people already know their cold email is not working.
They keep sending more, hoping volume saves them.
The fix is not more emails. It is a completely different ask.

SECTION TWO

The Interview Method

Every problem in Section One comes from the same root cause: you are leading with a pitch. The Interview Method removes the pitch entirely and replaces it with an invite. Instead of reaching out to sell, you reach out to feature your prospect on a podcast or interview series. You are inviting them to share their expertise. No pitch. No offer. Just an invite.

The reply rate on this is dramatically higher than any pitch-based outreach, because it is genuinely low-commitment to say yes to. You are not asking them to evaluate a service. You are asking them to talk about themselves. People almost always say yes to that.

Real Campaign — 9 Collective

9 Collective is an event production company targeting other events businesses. The founder had scaled his own company to a couple of million a year and wanted to help others do the same. We ran the Interview Method under the 9 Collective Podcast, targeting founders and directors at hybrid and virtual events companies, 1-100 employees, US and UK. 7,444 emails. 54.8% positive reply rate. Around 180 meetings booked.

What about if you cannot post the content publicly?

You do not have to. If you are in a corporate role or somewhere that public content would cause issues, run the Interview Method privately. You still do the call, still build the rapport, still make the transition. The guest gets their recording. You get the relationship and the meeting. Nothing gets posted. It works exactly the same way.

WHY THIS SIDESTEPS EVERYTHING IN SECTION ONE

- Not a pitch, so it never triggers the spam filter in their brain.
- Low commitment ask, so reply rates are dramatically higher.
- Genuine conversation, so trust is built before any offer is made.
- Natural transition, so the meeting feels earned, not sold.

SECTION THREE

The Recording Call

How to run a 30-minute conversation that does the selling for you.

The call is 30 minutes. That is the sweet spot. Long enough to build real rapport, short enough that they said yes to it without thinking too hard.

Before the call

Look at their LinkedIn. Look at their website. Find two or three genuinely interesting talking points about their career, their background, or something they have built. You want to stroke their ego a little and get them open. This is not fake flattery. It is research. The more prepared you are, the more natural the conversation feels, and the easier the transition becomes.

During the call

Keep it freeflowing and natural. This is not a scripted interview. It is a real conversation where you happen to be recording. The goal is rapport. Ask about their journey, what they have built, what is working. Get them talking. Get them comfortable. Get them open.

If they ask what you do during the call, keep it light. Tell them you run the podcast but also help companies like theirs scale through X, Y, Z. Give your initial value proposition, but do not dwell on it. Immediately flip it back: "You mentioned earlier you are struggling with X, tell me more about that." Always redirect back to them. You are a doctor here. You cannot diagnose until you have done the full consultation.

THE CONSULTANT MINDSET

Think of yourself as a doctor, not a salesperson.

A doctor asks questions first. They diagnose before they prescribe.

The more questions you ask, the more you understand the pain.

Once you understand the pain, the solution sells itself.

SECTION FOUR

The Anchor Question

The one question that transitions every call into a booked meeting.

About 75% of the way through the call, you drop the anchor question. It sounds like a natural part of the interview. It is not. It is the moment the whole call has been building towards.

THE ANCHOR QUESTION

"You are getting five to ten qualified meetings a month, that is genuinely impressive, most people would love to be in that position. I guess, if you could fix one thing about your business right now, what would it be?"

They will answer this honestly. The call context means they are already open and reflective. They might say onboarding takes too long. They might say they lose clients after month three. They might say they cannot get consistent leads. Whatever they say, write it down. That is your anchor.

The transition

The podcast is technically over. You have done the recording. Now, in the last few minutes of the call, you make the move. You reference the anchor and you open a door. Not a pitch. A door.

HOW IT SOUNDS

"John, you mentioned you are struggling with onboarding taking too long. Is that right?"

They confirm. Then:

"How long has it been like that?"

Ask more questions. Then:

"I am not saying I can definitely help, but there may be some ways we could streamline that so you are onboarding a couple more clients each week. Would it be helpful just to go over some ideas? No pressure, just a conversation."

Then book it in:

"Awesome. Let us hop on a call next Tuesday, we can learn a bit more about what is going on and see if there are any ways we can help. Does that sound good?"

WHY "IS THAT RIGHT?" CHANGES EVERYTHING

- It keeps you out of pitch mode.
- It signals you were actually listening, not just waiting to sell.
- It invites them to keep talking, which gives you more ammunition.
- It makes the transition feel like a natural follow-on, not a gotcha.

This works 99 times out of 100 when the interview was genuine and the anchor question landed naturally. The meeting is not sold. It is earned.

SECTION FIVE

After the Call

Assets, follow-up, and getting to the discovery call fast.

You have done the transition on the call and got the discovery call booked in. Now you need to deliver on the podcast side and keep the relationship warm. Both matter. Do not drop the ball on either.

What to send after the recording

1. Send a thank you message the same day. Keep it short. Tell them you enjoyed the conversation.
2. Use Riverside to edit the recording. Get it clipped, cleaned up, and ready to share.
3. Send them all the assets — full recording, clips, anything they can use. This is their payoff for saying yes to the invite.
4. Confirm the discovery call. Send a calendar invite immediately. Do not let it drift.

The discovery call

Get this booked in as fast as possible. Same week is ideal. The longer the gap between the podcast recording and the discovery call, the colder the relationship gets. Strike while the rapport is fresh.

On the discovery call, you are still in consultant mode. You are not walking in with a prepared pitch deck and a price list. You are walking in knowing one pain point from the anchor question, and your job is to uncover the rest. Ask more questions. Go deeper. Be comfortable not knowing what you are going to sell yet. That is not a weakness. That is the method.

WHAT YOU MIGHT END UP SELLING

- An automation that saves them 10 hours a week.
- A lead generation system built around their niche.
- A full growth retainer covering ads, outreach, and content.
- Something you had not even thought of before the call.

That is the beauty of this. The offer fits the pain. Every time.

This openness is what creates the big deals. Seven-figure deals have come from this method precisely because the offer was built around a real, diagnosed pain point rather than a generic package sold to everyone.

SECTION SIX

Building Your Lead List on Apollo

The filters that actually matter. And the ones to ignore.

Every campaign starts with a list. Get this wrong and it does not matter how good your emails are. You are talking to the wrong people.

The filters you need

Job titles

Founder, Co-Founder, Director, Partner, Managing Director, CEO, Owner. You want decision makers. Anyone who can say yes without asking someone else.

Company size

1 to 100 employees is the sweet spot. You can make it work for enterprise but the approach has to change. For most campaigns, stay in the 1-100 range. Faster decisions, less bureaucracy.

Location

Start with the US. The market is bigger, the budgets are higher, and the podcast invite method lands well there. UK works too. Avoid markets where English is not the primary business language unless you are running local language campaigns.

Industry

Use Apollo's industry filter to get into the right sector. This is not optional. Without it you are just spraying into the void.

Keywords

Use industry keywords to tighten the list further. But here is what most people get wrong: remove generic keywords unless you are specifically targeting those niches. If you are going after events companies or dental clinics or any local service business, remove keywords like marketing, software, SaaS, and advertising from your results. They will pollute your list with the wrong companies. If you are going after SaaS, that is a different story entirely.

THE KEYWORD EXCLUSION RULE

- Going after events companies? Remove: marketing, software, SaaS, advertising, agency.
- Going after dental clinics? Remove: tech, software, digital, marketing.
- Going after SaaS? Keep them. That is your world.

One bad keyword lets in a hundred wrong leads. Clean lists convert.

Once your list is built, verify every email before it goes near Instantly. NeverBounce or MillionVerifier. Remove anything not marked valid. Bounce rate above 3% will torch your sending domain.

SECTION SEVEN

The Sequence Logic

Why it works and how to structure it.

The shape of the sequence

Four touches over 10 days. Each one has a different angle and job:

1. Day 1 — The Invite: Podcast invite framing. Low commitment ask. Reference a similar guest or company. This is the door opener.
2. Day 3 — The Bump: Short and simple. "Just bumping this in case it got buried. Still a standing offer if the timing works."
3. Day 6 — The Reframe: Change the angle. "We are specifically looking for people in [their role/niche] for this series. The ask is light and the recording is yours to keep."
4. Day 10 — Close the Loop: Final touch. Permission to say no. "If the timing is off, no problem at all. Happy to revisit whenever it suits. Door is open."

The mechanics that matter

- Plain text only. No HTML, no images, no links in email 1. It should look like a human typed it in 45 seconds.
- Subject lines lowercase. No character. Just straightforward.
- Every sentence spintaxed. Every email in the sequence has 2+ variations per sentence. Subject lines, greetings, and CTAs are all spintaxed.
- One niche per sequence. Do not water down the targeting. Language and pain points must match how they actually talk.

The exact copy is what we build inside the sequence for each client's niche — the structure above is the part you can take and run with. The logic stays the same. The psychology works every time. But the language, the industry references, and the social proof are always tailored to the specific niche you are targeting.

Why People Fail at This (And How Not To)

Most people who try the Interview Method get inconsistent results. It is almost never because the method does not work. It is because of four very specific mistakes. Here they are.

They are not aggressive enough with volume

This sounds counterintuitive because everything about this method is the opposite of aggressive. The ask is gentle. The conversation is warm. The transition is soft. But the one place you need to be relentless is volume. Get on as many calls as you possibly can. The method compounds. Five calls a week beats one call a week. Every single time. If you are doing this properly, your calendar should be uncomfortable.

They skip the transition

This is the one that hurts. You do the outreach, you book the recording, you have a great conversation, and then you bottle the transition because it feels awkward. Do it anyway. Every single call without failure, even if it feels unnatural at first. Especially if it feels unnatural. The transition gets easier every time you do it. The calls where you skip it are wasted pipeline.

They show up to the discovery call with a pitch

You booked the discovery call to learn more, not to present a solution you already prepared. Show up with questions, not a deck. Be confident without being certain. You do not need to know what you are going to sell before the call starts. That is not a problem. That is the entire point. The offer comes from what you hear on the call.

They are not comfortable with the unknown

The discovery might lead to an automation project. It might lead to a full growth retainer. It might lead to something you have never sold before. That is not a bug in this method. It is the feature. The operators who close the biggest deals with this approach are the ones who are comfortable diagnosing first and building the offer second. Seven-figure deals have come from this method. None of them were sold with a pre-prepared pitch.

*"Be aggressive about the volume. Be gentle about everything else.
That combination is what makes this method work."*

SECTION NINE

The 10-Point Script Audit

Run every cold email through this before you send a single one.

CHECK	CRITERIA
01 · Length	☐ Under 65 words total ☐ Subject line under 5 words ☐ Reads in under 10 seconds
02 · The ask	☐ Podcast invite framing, not a pitch ☐ Low commitment to say yes to ☐ No calendar link in email 1
03 · Industry fit	☐ Wording fits the prospect's world ☐ Show name/angle is relevant to their niche ☐ Pain language matches how they actually talk
04 · Pattern disrupt	☐ Does not look like 99 other emails ☐ Subject line looks like it came from a real person ☐ No "hope you are well" or "I know you are busy"
05 · Spintax	☐ Every sentence has 2+ variations ☐ Subject line is spintaxed ☐ Greeting and CTA are spintaxed
06 · Social proof	☐ P.S. includes a name-drop or result ☐ Specific, not vague ☐ From the same or similar industry
07 · Readability	☐ Plain text only, no HTML or images ☐ Reads naturally out loud ☐ No jargon, no corporate speak
08 · Zero filler	☐ No "hope you are well" ☐ No "I know you are busy" ☐ No company backstory
09 · The CTA	☐ One soft CTA only ☐ Permission-based, not a demand ☐ Easy to say yes to in 2 seconds
10 · List match	☐ Wording matches the segment you built ☐ Persona-specific angle is clear ☐ One campaign = one niche

The 10-Step Nurture Sequence

For warm leads who replied but haven't booked the discovery call yet.

There is a 10-step nurture sequence designed specifically for leads who said yes to your podcast invite but are taking time to commit to the discovery call. 3-5 day gaps between each touch. Max 75 words per email. Every email has to earn its place — no generic bumps, no filler, no wasted space.

The sequence moves through key moments: delivery of assets, sharing a useful insight, showing a case study, handling the most common objection, creating urgency, projecting what you could do for them, checking in permission-style, and finally the breakup email that paradoxically books more meetings than you'd expect.

This is part of what gets built when you work with us directly — a full nurture flow tailored to your specific niche and buyer journey, every step tested and spintaxed for your industry.

You now understand cold email better than most people who send it.

But understanding it and running it are different sports. The thinking is the easy part. The execution is where it's won or lost.

Done for You
